The speech had merely made Marietta yawn. She had looked upon marriage as a rather tiresome necessity belonging to the distant future, until her acquaintance with Herbert began. Then, when this handsome young Englishman betrayed his admiration for her, her heart had begun to flutter and beat, and the world of sentiment opened before her, for the first time. Herbert might have awakened a gentle passion in her, if his own passion had not been so strong that it frightened hers away. For once he had got beyond the region of flirtation; for the first time a...
